Pretty standard for the group, nothing much to say on the Knox. I can think of a few tricks to get access to a webserver, but a full box would be a good test to see if something more obscure exists. Here is something of a new phish. This is the Emotet group that never really dropped their version 0 access they have. Word docs with base64 command lines get their own category. Its a really simple file include that uses a standard, not the most in-vogue, method for make an image to get code execution. The image was already executing, but with a lot of imports to way too many trusted binaries. I tested this exact exploit, and was able to get an elevated shell. I didnt see any AV help at the time, so its likely there are some AV changes in the works. Roulette sniper makes you win roulette the easy way.
